Introduction

Internationally, teacher educators can be seen as a unique group of university academics. In addition to possessing subject knowledge in their discipline, they also possess the ability to support pre-service teachers in understanding how to teach the subject to school age learners. In other words, they are not just teachers, but “teachers of teachers” (Loughran, 2006).

University teacher educators thus have a double responsibility: both to the pre-service teachers with whom they work, and to the students in schools who will be taught by the pre-service teachers firstly on practicum, and then as qualified teachers. This responsibility requires a distinct form of pedagogical content knowledge, additional to that outlined by Shulman (1986). In recognition of this double role, statements of competency (or standards) for teacher educators have been developed and adopted in some countries: for example: The Netherlands and the USA. While these standards do not have statutory status, they serve to emphasise the significance of the professional knowledge, skills and values teacher educators are expected to hold.

Why develop a Competency Framework for teacher educators in Palestine?

In the light of new developments in initial teacher education in Palestine, it is appropriate to consider the competences required in order to be an effective teacher educator in the Palestinian context. The competence framework presented on the following pages has been developed in consultation with experienced teacher educators from three universities based in the West Bank and Gaza.

How can the Competency Framework be used by teacher educators?

The Competency Framework has the potential to be used in several ways:

- As the basis for self-evaluation by Palestinian teacher educators. Individual university lecturers can reflect on the evidence they currently possess for each competency indicator and identify areas for personal professional development.
- Where university policy requires individual lecturers to develop a professional development portfolio, this should be based on the Competency Framework.
- The induction and professional development of new university lecturers involved in teacher education should be based on the competences within the Framework.
